Dorchester County Jail, site
500 Court Lane
Cambridge
County

c. 1882
Architect: Charles L. Carson

The Dorchester County Jail, which stood to the southeast of the County Courthouse from c. 1882 until its demolition in 1994, was a Queen Anne and Romanesque Revival style granite structure with brick and terra cotta appointments. The building had two intersecting rectangular wings, each under a hip roof. A cupola with a finial crowned both the front and rear portions, and a circular tower stood at the northeast corner. The second-story windows on the rear portion were tall and narrow-proportioned under brick arches. Beltcourses of brick and terra cotta ornamented the exterior walls and contrasted crisply with the stonework. The building had a dentiled cornice, embellished by brackets around the front portion.

The significance of the Dorchester County Courthouse and Jail site is drawn from two sources. First, in the area of politics and government, the buildings have been a symbol of government and law in Dorchester County since their construction in the 19th century. The courthouse also has architectural significance. Although altered extensively on the inside, the building still retains the basic exterior design and shape as prepared by Richard Upjohn in 1851. Upjohn designed a number of buildings in Maryland, mainly churches, but the Dorchester County Courthouse is the only courthouse. The jail, which was one of the few governmental buildings on the Eastern Shore designed in the Queen Anne style, was the work of the Baltimore architect, Charles L. Carson, who practiced in the late 19th century.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The front facade of the jail faces Court Lane to the northwest. The jail is a two-story, three-bay stone building with an adjoining four-bay cell block at the rear. There is a round tower topped by a hemispherical roof located at the east corner of the cell block; a round chimney projects from the surface of the rear wall of the cell block. Each main section of the building is topped by a pyramidal slate roof and cupola.

Exterior finish consists of coursed granite ornamented with horizontal bands of terra cotta tile, white stone window lintels in the main block, and round brick arches above the windows in the cell block. The stone mortar joints throughout have been ornamented with terra-cotta-colored pencil joints applied over the original gray-white mortar joints. The original front facade, embellished with a slightly projecting center bay topped by a pedimented cross gable, has been partially obscured by the addition of a mid-twentieth century cinder block addition. The bracketed cornice which caps the main block is still visible above the modern addition.

The interior of the main block was heavily altered in 1934 and subsequent years; consequently, very little original interior finish remains. The cell block; which was also heavily altered in 1934, currently consists of two floors fitted with ten cells on each floor. Each cell, measuring approximately 6' by 7', is furnished with two bunks hung from the wall, a toilet, and a sink. Three parallel corridors which run the length of the cell block provide access to each cell as well as to plumbing apparatus and a rear passageway. The jail is currently vacant and is slated for demolition.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The Dorchester County Jail, a prominent Cambridge landmark, is one of the few stone buildings on the Eastern Shore and has been placed on the National Register of Historic Places.

Built in 1883, the jail was designed by Charles L. Carson of Baltimore in a Renaissance-Revival style. In 1934, the original interior was removed and a new reinforced concrete interior was inserted. Some time during the 1950s, a cinder-block one story interior addition was added.

The Dorchester County Jail, built in 1882, is a Romanesque Revival style building of masonry construction. It consists of two intersecting rectangular wings, each under a hip roof. There is a cupola with a finial over both the front and rear portions. On the northeast corner of the building is a circular tower. The second story windows on the rear portion are tall narrow proportioned windows under rounded brick arches. Beltcourses of brick and terracotta ornament the exterior walls and contrast with the stonework. The building has a dentiled cornice, which is further embellished by brackets around the front portion. Added to the west facade on front of the jail is a small one story addition of brick and frame construction, built sometime in the 20th century. On the old part of the west facade, to the rear of this, is a center gable with a lunette window.
